Confessing The Value of Trust

I do not want to live a life of mistrust to me, that defeats the purpose of a human/ gammamalian life.

But I find myself sympathizing w/ those who do not trust / who have lost trust in their family and in themselves. And I acknowledge given the current state of the world of terror that mistrust is a valuable defense.

But what of those who beyond all trauma cannot help but trust - to continually lay down for the others who know better to trample over.

Why is it so utterly important to know truth / to not lie? That is the only 'defense' assurance for those altruistic few who have maintained a pathological love and trust in humanities greater purpose. For which people have and continue to die for.
